EARLY TIMES

Would you like to find yourself in the Stone Age? Imagine you woke up in the Stone Age, about 15,000 years ago. There would be no towns, no roads, and no buildings. But what would be there? There would be wild nature full of wild animals like giant hairy elephants and bears. People lived with large groups of relatives. They were nomads – people who, having no permanent house, move from place to place in search of food.

Tools were made of rocks, branches or animal bones. Usually they were too heavy to carry, so parents taught their children how to make new tools in a new place. The making of tools is an example of technology. It is the development of useful things that make our life easier. For example, computers and cell phones are part of modern technology.

The most important Stone Age technology was about making fire. Fire had many uses – to warm people, to cook meat and to frighten dangerous animals away from the cave. To carry and keep fire people invented a kind of lamp – a stone base, filled with animal fat or grease. Later flint helped people to improve their technology. Flint is a very hard rock that produces sparkles, when we rub it against another rock.
