Soldiers of the Early Middle Ages

Armies in the Early Middle Ages were small, usually fewer than 1,000 men. Almost every member of the army was a professional warrior who was called a knight.

Only sons of the lords and their vassals, who were also land owners, could become knights. Serfs, who owned no land, didn't get such a right.

A boy began his first step of training as a page at the age of seven. He was sent to the castle of a powerful lord. There he learned how to use such weapons as a sword and a long spear, called a lance.

Only at the age of 14 a page moved to a second stage of training and became a squire. A squire acted as a personal servant of the knight who was his master.

Only at the age of 20 a squire was ready for a knighthood. Sometimes he was knighted earlier, after a deed of great bravery on the battlefield. This feat was often celebrated at a special ceremony at his lord's castle.

A knight obeyed special rules that were part of a style of life known as chivalry. The rules of chivalry developed over many centuries. A knight had to be religious, brave and loyal to his lord. He also had to treat all women with respect.

Even though few knights followed all the rules, legends, poems and songs about brave knights and their fair ladies were told and spread around Europe by Troubadours – wandering singers.
